Fact sheet: Becoming a registered Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Health Practitioner

Who's who in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Health Practice regulation?

The National Board

<http://www.atsihealthpracticeboard.gov.au>

The Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Health Practice Board of Australia (National Board) is responsible for:

- registering practitioners who meet the minimum standards
- investigating and managing notifications (concerns or complaints) about the performance, conduct or health of practitioners (except in New South Wales which has a co-regulatory system), and
- developing standards, codes and guidelines.

The National Board is a part of the National Registration and Accreditation Scheme (the National Scheme) and is supported by the Australian Health Practitioner Regulation Agency (AHPRA). The National Scheme has patient safety at its heart.

The role of the National Board is to protect the public in accordance with the Health Practitioner Regulation National Law as in force in each state and territory (National Law).

The Australian Health Practitioner Regulation Agency (AHPRA)

www.ahpra.gov.au

AHPRA administers the National Scheme and provides operational and administrative support to the National Board in their core role of protecting the public.

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Health Practice Accreditation Committee (Accreditation committee)

<http://www.atsihealthpracticeboard.gov.au/Accreditation/ATSIHP-Accreditation-Committee.aspx>

This committee is responsible for:

- recommending accreditation standards to the National Board for approval, and
- assessing programs of study and education providers to determine whether accreditation standards are being met.

Under the National Scheme, the course accreditation function is at arm's length from the National Board. The Board does not make a decision about a course until the course has been accredited by the Accreditation committee.

In the cases where the Accreditation committee accredits a course of study, under the National Law it must provide a report to the Board for its consideration.

In the cases where the Accreditation committee revokes the accreditation of a course of study, under the National Law, the approval of that course of study is taken to be cancelled at the same time.

The Accreditation committee is the independent accreditation authority for the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander health profession.

Accreditation standards

These standards help to ensure that education providers and programs of study provide students with the knowledge, skills and professional attributes to competently practise as Aboriginal and Torres Strait Island health practitioners in Australia.

Becoming a registered Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Health Practitioner

In order to call yourself an Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander health practitioner or claim to be qualified as an Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander health practitioner you must be registered with the National Board.

To become registered, applicants must meet the Board's mandatory registration standards.

There are several types of registration available. General registration allows unrestricted clinical practice within a practitioner's scope of practice.

Section 53 of the National Law outlines the requirements for qualifications for general registration:

An individual is qualified for general registration in a health profession if—

- (a) the individual holds an approved qualification for the health profession; or*
- (b) the individual holds a qualification the National Board established for the health profession considers to be substantially equivalent, or based on similar competencies, to an approved qualification; or*
- (c) the individual holds a qualification, not referred to in paragraph (a) or (b), relevant to the health profession and has successfully completed an examination or other assessment required by the National Board for the purpose of general registration in the health profession; or*
- (d) the individual—*
  - (i) holds a qualification, not referred to in paragraph (a) or (b), that under this Law or a corresponding prior Act qualified the individual for general registration (however described) in the health profession; and*
  - (ii) was previously registered under this Law or the corresponding prior Act on the basis of holding that qualification.*

Finding out if a course is accredited

The best way to find out whether a program of study is accredited, and provides a qualification for general registration is to refer to the Approved Programs of Study list on the National Board's website under the 'Accreditation' tab.

If your course is not listed on the National Board website there is a risk that you will not graduate with an approved qualification.

Working in a clinical position while not registered

You must be registered with the National Board to practise as an Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander health practitioner or work as an Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander health practitioner.

Claiming to be a registered Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander health practitioner, or holding yourself out as being registered, is an offence under the National Law. The maximum penalty which a court may impose is $30,000 (in the case of an individual) or $60,000 (in the case of a body corporate).

However, you can legally work in administrative roles or support roles in an Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander clinical setting as long as you are not treating or offering clinical or therapeutic advice to patients or holding yourself out as being a registered Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander health practitioner.
